For the person holding this

You uploaded the Freedom Tracker prompt to your AI, and now you're looking at a ledger about the national debt, wondering what it has to do with you.

Everything — but not in the order you'd expect. People learn about themselves first. That's not a flaw in you; it's how everyone is built. So don't start with the country's questions. Start with yours. Your AI already has the tracker running. Ask it these, out loud, in your own words — the asking is where the learning starts, because a question you speak is a thought you've finally written down where you can see it.

Copy any question exactly as written, or say it your way. Your way is better.

Start with your own money

1. "Here's everything I owe: [list it]. Add it up and freeze it as my baseline."
2. "How much interest am I personally paying — per day? Show me that number by itself."
3. "Portion my total into a day's drink. What does one day of my debt actually look like?"

Then see yourself in the big number

1. "What's my share of the national debt — per citizen, per household? Show the math."

2. "What was the national debt on the day I was born? Put my lifetime on one ledger next to my own debt."
3. "Which is compounding faster right now — the country's interest, or mine?"

Then watch your own pattern

1. "If I pay [amount] every week, on what date does my balance start going down in a pattern — one print, two prints, three prints in a row?"
2. "Keep my ledger. Every time I come back, hand it to me first and tell me what changed about me."
3. "Teach me one thing about my own numbers today. Just one. At my pace."

And when you're ready, the country's questions

1. "What's the total today, and what's my baseline? Show me the ledger and walk me through every column."
2. "How much did it change today — and what's the direction count: an idea, a coincidence, or a pattern?"
3. "Why does this only move once a day? What are those websites that tick every second actually doing?"
4. "Who holds this debt — how much does the public hold, and how much is the government owing itself?"
5. "Has it ever gone down three prints in a row? When, and what was happening then?"

This file is alive

These questions came from real people asking real first questions. As more people start, their best first questions get added here — the file is re-issued, dated, and versioned each time, and the new version replaces the old one wherever it travels.

If a question opens a door for you, tell the person who gave you this file. It may end up helping the next person start.

Thanks be to God!
